In a clearing, a great distance from the wishing well, was the tree that the old man had spoken about. It had long, sinuous roots, which crawled across the leaf-littered floor and a thick trunk, supporting huge branches. Autumn had brought about the annual shedding of the tree's leaves and had exposed the small door at the base of the trunk. The door was crafted from solid wood with one small glass window and had a round door handle.

DADWAVERS! Openers

Description- In a comfortable house, in a sizable oak tree, in an enchanted forest, lived a most curious creature named Staghorn Treebark.

Action- Sparks of bright light suddenly burst from the book, and seconds later, a strange smoke uncurled from the pages.

Dialogue- "You shall not get the better of me, Staghorn Treebark!" laughed Azalea, brandishing a shining ebony wand.

Where- Beyond the treeline, he could see dark patches where fire had consumed the land and everything on it; he knew who had started those fires.

Adverb- Mercilessly, she pinned him to the floor and laughed as he writhed to try and free himself.

Verb- Motioning to the others to be silent, Grizelda Knotweed took her position on the tree stump and began her speech.

Estimation of time- It was a little after sunrise, as the first shafts of sunlight warmed the earth, that he saw it.

Rhetorical Question- What would he do? Did anyone have the power to defeat Azalea?

Simile/Metaphor - She grinned, gripping the wand, then snapped it in two like a petulant child.
